Knowledge has three degreesâ€”opinion, science, illumination. The means or instrument of the first is sense; of the second, dialectic; of the third, intuition. --Plotinus

Gut Feelings: The Intelligence of the Unconscious

Two years ago, when Malcolm Gladwell published his best-selling â€œBlink: The Power of Thinking Without Thinking,â€• readers throughout the world were introduced to the ideas of Gerd Gigerenzer, a German social psychologist. known in social science circles for his breakthrough studies on the nature of intuitive thinking. Before his research, this was a topic often dismissed as crazed superstition. Now he has written his own book, â€œGut Feelings: The Intelligence of the Unconsciousâ€•. In this New York Times interview he shares more about his work and also about how he makes decisions in his own life.

Be The Change:

Here is a short, thought-provoking passage on intuition and transformational learning.
